The quest for public health in Manchester: the industrial city, the NHS and the recent history

Emma L Jones and John V Pickstone

Manchester is a classic case in the world-history of industrialisation and health. This pioneering book outlines the long history but focuses on the last 60 years. It analyses the roles and interactions of the City council, academic public health and the changing structures of the NHS. For one key city, it explores the responses both to new health challenges and to political revisions – in the hope that we can learn from history.

Community, professions and business: a history of the Central Manchester Teaching Hospitals and the NHS

Helen K Valier and John V Pickstone

In 2009 five Manchester hospitals – Manchester Royal Infirmary, St Mary's, the Royal Eye Hospital and the children's hospitals now at Pendlebury and Booth Hall – will be housed together in a largely new complex. This book outlines their histories, focusing on the NHS years. It analyses both medical and managerial developments, including contested restructurings. It aims to show how repeated national policy changes interacted with local histories, thus contributing to policy studies as well as medical and regional history.

The history of science and technology in the North West

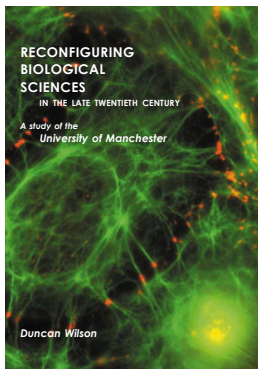

(Vol 18 (2007) of the Manchester Region History Review)

Edited by John Pickstone

Perhaps better than any other city, Manchester illustrates the historical relations between the growth of science and the growth of industry. The introduction to this volume provides a sketch map; the articles range from seventeenth century astronomy to debates about science policy. They span from early textile engineering to industrial research labs, and from meteorology to museums, vividly illustrating the range of historical scholarship and the centrality of Manchester.

Reconfiguring Biological Sciences in the late twentieth century: a study of the University of Manchester

Duncan Wilson

The second half of the twentieth century saw massive changes in the biological sciences. Research methods were transformed, new applications were developed, and biomedical sciences were reorganised world-wide. This is first local case-study of such changes, focusing on the 1980s and 90s. Accessibly written, it explores the causes of the Manchester reforms, and the effects on research, teaching, publicity and the economic regeneration of Manchester.

Medical history in Manchester: health and healing in an industrial city, 1750-2005 (Vol 87, number 1 (2005) of the Bulletin of the John Rylands University Library of Manchester)

Ed John V Pickstone and Stella V F Butler

The Introduction surveys the history and the literature. The articles range from Cholera 1832, to recent hip replacements, via issues of medical professionalisation, rabies, Jewish medical charities, academic medicine and the recent history of the teaching hospital; plus guides to local medical archives and the medical school museum collections. Most of the articles were written at the Wellcome Unit for the History of Medicine, University of Manchester, and represent the best of recent scholarship.
